NO DUES OUTSTANDING!

All members are now paid – a wonderful thing! – with only the loss of a few not renewing.

That said, we now stand at 92 paying members – not exactly a large group – so do what you can to interest new members. If you love New Jersey postal history, share it with others. If you would like a stack of membership forms or old journals to encourage others, or to drop at your local library, just ask. Bob Rose will be happy to comply.

PRESIDENT’S MESSAGE

Recent weeks have seen commentary on philatelic chat boards and elsewhere concerning two significant issues that touch upon postal history. The first is the challenge of the continued viability of State postal history societies. The second, the “appropriate” balance of philatelic research measured against the inclusion of social history and commentary in philatelic publications. With respect to the first point, our Society’s membership has remained stable over the last 20 years, in large part due to the internet and the ability to sign up new members through our website. Second, we appreciate the kind words of support from our membership concerning the content and quality of our journal. The articles that appear in these pages often provide social and historical context to provide the reader with a better understanding of the how and why a piece of mail was written and the context in which it went from posting to delivery.

This issue contains a wide range of articles consistent with that editorial approach. We welcome Tim O’Connor to these pages with the story of a pair of colonial covers that were carried by the “Morris Post” in 1774 from Hibernia Furnace, then a focal point of iron ore mining, to New York. Roger Curran describes the fancy monogrammed Blairstown cancels. John Lupia continues with his series on New Jersey stamp dealers. Don Chafetz contributes another article on foreign mail to Morris County. Jean Walton writes about a letter not stating that the “check’s in the mail.” Larry Brennan contributes another article on Naval Air Station Lakehurst, and the nonrigid airships that were based there, this one on USS Akron and Macon. I write on the discovery of a late use of a Shark River stampless postmark, and a second article concerning the recent auction sale of two 1870 covers from Newark to a missionary in Beirut. A reprint from the past by Harry M. Konwiser completes the issue.

One final note: last year’s four issues of NJPH have been entered in the literature competition at the APS StampShow to be held in Omaha in August. I hope to see some of you at the Show. Have a great summer!

PER THE MORRIS POST: Hibernia Furnace to New York City in 1774

By Tim O'Connor

The William Alexander archive in the New York Historical Society houses many letters from the pre-revolutionary and wartime eras. During an exploration of that archive I encountered two letters from Hibernia Furnace in Morris County, New Jersey which bore interesting superscriptions. They are the topic of this report.

Illustration from *The Pulse of the People, NJ 1763-1789*¹

Fig. 1: Pre-revolutionary pig iron from Hibernia Furnace, Morris County, NJ.

Morris County sits in the New Jersey Highlands, a physiographic province of the eastern slopes of the Appalachian Mountains, extending from Reading Pennsylvania to the Housatonic River in Connecticut. Iron ores in the form of lenses, seams and veins abound in the metamorphic rocks. Ore quality is excellent with scarce magnetite, the highest quality of iron ore, being easily found. Knowledge of the ore can be traced back to the Penn Proprietorship, and they probably heard about the “black rock” from the Lenape Indians. Mining and smelting started about 1710, and iron soon became a profitable export commodity as well as filling a local need. Actually, the production of iron became so valuable that the Crown sought to control it with the Iron Act of 1750. Arguably the predecessor of the many Coercive Acts, it encouraged production of lower quality bar and cast iron, demanding that these be shipped to Britain where their smiths would forge it into steel to be sold back to the Colonies. While there were many iron producers in the Highlands, we focus on the Hibernia Furnace which came into the possession of William Alexander in 1771.

William Alexander was born in New York City in 1727 into a prosperous merchant family. He was well educated in the sciences. He married the sister of New York Governor William Livingston and became active in the New York social scene. His military career began with the French and Indian wars, acting as a provisional agent for the British army, and Aide-de-Camp for Governor General William Shirley. He met Colonel George Washington in this capacity. In 1756, being the last male of the Scottish Stirling Clan, he pursued a claim to the vacant title, Lord Stirling. He joined the Continental army in 1775, and had a role in the 1776

Battle of Long Island, acting in the rearguard, which delayed British forces so as to allow Washington to retreat safely. He was captured, exchanged and promoted to Major General in February 1777.

PER THE MORRIS POST: Hibernia Furnace to NYC ~Tim O'Connor

Both letters are from Joseph Hoff, Superintendent of the Hibernia Furnace Forge. The letters detail the tasks and provisions necessary for a successful iron smelting operation in the 18th century. In particular, we note the work necessary to prepare the nearby roads so as to insure the arrival of vast quantities of cut wood which would be turned into charcoal to fuel a blast furnace. Good roads would also be necessary to transport the heavy finished product, iron in some form, to Elizabethtown.

Figure 3, a letter from Hoff to “The Rt Hon^{ble} The Earl of Stirling now at New York” is datelined January 28, 1774. It went “per Morris Post.” In the letter, Hoff lists the “absolute necessity... of having sufficient quantities of rum, molasses, tea, sugar, blistered steel, blankets, tobacco, pork, flour and (gun) powder,” these items to be hoarded prior to the initiation of a “blast” for the smelting of iron. (Once a “blast” is initiated the temperature of the charcoal furnace must not be allowed to drop or the impurities won’t separate from the iron. Forgemen would work around the clock for days, in shifts.) Hoff goes on to say that Lord Stirling must pay the balance of a supplier’s bill before “he would aid us again.” Hoff notes his brother, Charles, had engaged a “bellowsmaker” and he has “inquired about (water)wheel repairs (both necessary components of an iron forge). “The road to Mount Hope is cleared,” and he has acquired planks for the dam and awaits slate stone for the road.

 February 10, 1774.
 Docketed “Letter from
 Jos. Hoff, Feb. 10,
 1774.” Neither letter
 shows any postal markings.

The Figure 4 letter, datelined February 10, 1774, is superscribed “Per Morristown Post.” In it, Hoff reports that the ore has been secured and also sufficient hay (for the horses) until “the grass comes.”

The word “Post” may not refer to a postal system as Morristown would not have a formal post office until after the Revolutionary War broke out.³ Rather, I think it more likely that “Post” refers to a person riding between Morristown and Elizabethtown, site of a Post Office under the Crown during Alexander Spotswood’s administration.⁴ In my searches, the next reference to a “Morristown Post” is from an August 31, 1776 Hoff letter to Colonel Stephen Moylan of the Continental Army. He reports that the Forge could provide “36 or 38 three pound cannon” and that he has the ore that he needs, but needs “not less that 50 pounds proclamation money.” He asks for “a prompt answer by the return of the Morristown Post.”⁵ No mention of a Morristown post has been identified in newspapers extant at this time.

The following 1780 map describes the location of the Hibernia Furnace, and Morristown, as well as New York City.

Fig. 5: Section of a 1780 map from Universal Magazine,⁶ showing this section of New Jersey with roads, six years after the 1774 letter to Lord Stirling.

Similarly, the route of the Morris Post is subject to conjecture. Hoff notes that delivery to the Hibernia Furnace depends of “rivers being frozen.” So too, a post rider might have changed routes based on freezes and high water altering river crossings.

In summary, we report two similar superscriptions referring to a messenger service from Morris County to New York. Both letters lack traditional postal markings, and appear to have gone free to Stirling. We hope that future researchers will be able to fill in the blanks about the Morristown Post.

Fig. 11: Casting the pigs – molten iron flowed from the furnace's tap hole into channels compressed in sand in the floor. The main stream was referred to the "sow," and the laterals as "pigs" as they resembled piglets. The crude iron was then sold to be further processed and refined.⁸
